The night was young, the party was full, so I stood in the kitchen with a few of the other volunteers from our campaign. Someone had found some amazing specimens in the garden and I insisted they come to the kitchen for "a little taste". As we sat back and took a few sips of the Chilean wine, the kitchen filled with the sound of popping corks, and the wine aroma of new wine, grapes, and luscious red and red fruity grape skins. We ate and enjoyed a few stories, laughed and told jokes, and waited for the fireworks. At precisely 10:00 p.m. (time for the alcohol to be consumed) the fireworks commenced. They were perfect and perfectly synchronized to the music being played, and to our fanfare for Chile. The fireworks lasted less than a minute, but in those few minutes, they were fantastic. They made the night come alive. They were like little rays of sunshine. They entertained, they made us happy, and they inspired us to get out and vote! At the end of the fireworks, I grabbed my whistle to see my beloved Chileans from the trenches, and in the last minute of the fireworks, we each blew our whistles together, sending the colours of Chile into the night sky. It was beautiful. It's beautiful to feel and witness the beauty of Chile, and this election campaign, has been filled with many beautiful moments: I was reminded every few weeks that this wasn't just a normal election. This election was different. This election was historic. In a room above the Provincial Committee, we spoke about the value of democracy. We used Democracy as a long term strategic plan to connect young people to public institutions and, as an extra special new thing, we have the real chance to decide where young people go and what they do. In a room above the Portobelo election office, young volunteers passed out large posters with our opponents' answers to our questions, and put up campaign posters for all the sloths on the seas b7e8fdf5c8

With regards to this accepted answer by @The Photon, is it possible for a user's current working directory to affect the value of $(shell pwd) inside a shell script? When I tested it I can see the current working directory changed with each test I ran of the following snippet. #$(echo $PWD) /Library/iTerm/3.2.2/iTerm # $PWD /var/folders/r9/15pq9r941p70zgpu7yvsk2h0000gn/T/bash-workspace-idr506/iTerm A: Yes, if the current directory is root's home folder: /. In my example, the value for $(pwd) is: /tmp/bash-workspace-idr506 which means that the current directory is /tmp/bash-workspace-idr506. (Note that this is not the same as $PWD which represents the current directory at the time the shell starts.) If I don't put the cd first, the current directory is /. Another way to see this is to test it yourself: $ cat |./trim $ # Change directory first, so that ./trim reports the correct current directory $ cd x $./trim ./trim: line 6: PWD: No such file or directory ./trim: line 9: PWD: No such file or directory ./trim: line 11: PWD: No such file or directory ./trim: line 12: PWD: No such file or directory ./trim: line 13: PWD: No such file or directory ./trim: line 14: PWD: No such file or directory ./trim: line
